PERSONAL AND SOCIETY.

Still progressive euchre has the lead as a means of entertaining, and those who do not play cards have a somewhat lonesome time of it, for there is not enough of anything else going on to keep one in good social trim. Several very delightful lunches have been given, and the average young woman delights more in an invitation to a luncheon or dinner than in almost anything luncheon or dinner than in almost anything else, for a luncheon is almost sure to be given to a few, and to be asked to one is a compument. A gentleman and his wife were discussing invitations one day, and the lady said she did not think it much of a compliment to be asked to an afternoon reception when there were so many others asked; but the gentleman took another view, and one entirely new to his wife, and that was that he should consider it more a mark of esteem to be thought of when there were so many.

Reception days are slowly growing in favor, and numerous calling cards have a day of the week marked on the lower lafthand corner, signifying, of course, that a visitor will surely find on that day the one on whom she wishes to call at home. Some people are very punctilious about remaining at home on the day named, no matter what happens. One lady is said to be so very particular about her calling day that a visitor can never find her at home at any other time, and the maid or butler who opens the door informs the caller that madame is not at home, unless it happens to be the special day named on her cards. This is a very rare occurrence, however. A great deal more could be made of the custom if visitors would pay some attention to the wishes of those who have a day especially set apart for receiving. One lady, and it is possible there are many others, says she stays at home all the afternoon of her day of the week and no one calls, but the preceding and subsequent days when she is apt to be away, many people come. Of course it can not be that all those people return her calls merely for form, though calling is to a great extent mere form. Of necessity it has to be kept up, to maintain that wonderful, intangible thing, society. But if the ladies wish to become proficient in all the rules fashionable card etiquette prescribes they may as well give up their literature, Shakspeare, Browning, current event, and other classes for a few months and make a regular study of cards and calling. visitor will surely find on that day the one classes for a few months and make a regu-lar study of cards and calling.

Rev. H. A. Cleveland has returned from Passaic City, N. J., where he delivered a Wednesday evening, before, and special invitation of, the Kenilworth Club and their guests, the Nineteenth Century Club. The Doctor's subject was "The Vocation of Culture." The Daily News of that place has the following: "Rarely has it been the good fortune of the people of Passaic to listen, within their own city, to a more interesting and finished address. The Doctor is, admittedly, one of the finest belles-lettres scholars in the country, and the fruits of his entensive reading and masterly grasp of that which is best in the thought of the great scholars of the past and his more than philosophical diagnosis of the men and measures of to-day, stamp him as one of the very few men who read with a purpose, and are competent to press home upon their fellows the resultant truths. Perhaps no better commendation of his address can be given than to say, as was the general comment of those who heard it, that the effect of that address must surely be to stimulate both thought and effort here in our midst along the lines of social and intellectual culture. We do not hesitate to say that both of the literary societies of our city last evening received an impulse and encouragement which will go far to make those societies of still greater interest and efficiency."
